The Daily Quote

"Debt-limit politics, back already. House Republicans will advance the Full Faith and Credit Act this week, legislation aimed primarily at protecting the conference from blame if they refuse to raise the country’s borrowing limit and the United States defaults. The bill would allow the Treasury to sell just enough debt to cover the payments on outstanding bonds, and to make Social Security payments. That, proponents argue, would ensure that ratings agencies would not once again downgrade America’s credit. Too bad it’s not true. Certainly, credit ratings agencies and investors want some assurance that the United States is going to make good on its debt... Remember, Washington did not lose its gold-plated, triple-A credit rating in 2011 because America failed to pay its bills. Instead, S&P cited the decline in ‘effectiveness, stability, and predictability of American policymaking.’ Perhaps if Congress really wants to protect the United States from a downgrade, it should consider the reasons it was downgraded in the first place."
